Once there was a rich merchant. He traded in cotton. He had a flourishing business. A number of people worked in his godowns. Once he had to go to Mumbai in connection with his business. He was away from home for about a week. In his absence, several bales of cotton were stolen from his godown. The merchant reported the matter to the police. A regular report was lodged with the police. An enquiry was made in the matter and a large number of people were interrogated. But the thieves were not traced out.

One day the merchant had a talk about the whole affair with an intimate friend who was very much interested in him. He said, "It is quite easy to trace out the thieves. Call people to a feast and I shall tell you the thieves." So, a large number of people were invited to a feast. When the feast was going on, the merchant's friend stood up and said, "It is very kind of you, gentlemen, to have responded to the invitation. It is always a pleasure to sit and dine together." He cast a searching glance over all present and said, "Even the thieves who stole bales of cotton are present here. They are foolish. Cotton is still sticking to their beards." The thieves raised their hands to their beards to see if cotton was still sticking their. No sooner did they do it than they were caught. They were handed over to the police. They confessed their guilt and returned the bales of cotton quite intact.

- 1) What did the rich merchant trade in? Why had he once visited Mumbai?
- 2) What happened in his absence?
- 3) What did he do when he came back? Was the enquiry successful?
- 4) Why did the merchant's friend tell him to arrange a feast?
- 5) What did the thieves do when they were caught?
- 6) Give meanings of the following words as used in the passage.

1. Flourishing 2. Lodged 3. Interrogated 4. Traced 5. Intimate
